It comes! At high noon, after heavy hours of almost insupportable waiting, Hancock's veterans are veritably relieved to hear the report of a signal gun from the crust of the height in their front, though they know that a tempest of lead bolts of death from the massed Confederate antillery will buist upon them and last until they are believed to be so demoralized that a grand charge in force will inevitably carthey are believed to be so demoralized that a grand charge in force will mewtably carry their position. The fire of 120 gmm is centered on Hancock. For almost three hours the hill is gashed by round shot and torn by bursting shells. Unon batteries aggregating 50 cannon make reply, but gradually shacken fire. The Federal infantry, though crouching behind every rock and tree trunk, nestling in each hollow or lying flat on the ground, basufficed severely from the aerial visitations of death, but far less than Lee supposed, the gunners bearing proportionately many faid more of the burden.

And now from behind the Confederate batteries issues a cloud of akirmishers. Meads and Hancock at once understund that the grand final charge is starting, and the former orders Slocum to instea his reserves across the upland to support Hancock and Sickles.

Mr. Jefferson also has visited this region and has expressed the helief that it is per haps richer in tradition that is fascinating and romantic of the Revolutionary times than perhaps any other in the country. It is only a few miles away that that magnificent and tragic romance of the Revolution, the capture of Major Andre, took place.

Booth was not a great reader of romances, and for the ordinary tale he cared nothing, but like Robert Louis Stowenson, and among public men Tom Reed and the late Booth was not a great reader of romances, and for the ordinary tale he cored nothing, but like Hobert Louis Stovenson, and among public men Tom Reed and the lato Roscoe Conkiling, he was a great admirer of Dumas' "Three Guardsmen" and is said to have read and reread it for mental recreation frequently when he was, in these ation frequently when he was in thos gloomy moods which sometimes possessed him. He was of course a constant although
